Description

As contemporary become increasingly global and hybrid, will diasporas become the new imperialism? Diasporas, Identities and Spaces Between explores the various ways the concept of diaspora has evolved. From communities living in exile, to groups defining their experience in the absence of their homeland and their search for a new identity. This book seeks to contribute to the understanding of diasporas, their identities and the spaces they inhabit. It explores the challenges of living in a world where the boundaries between home and host are fluid, and where the concept of diaspora is constantly evolving.
